If you move this app to a removable drive and keep the local directory as the output path, you'll build your own pocket archive. Not the easiest program to use If ease-of-use and a basic dashboard recipe are what you're after, you might want to look for another app. You don't have to be a rocket scientist to master LinkSaver, but a decent amount of skill and HTML knowledge is required. Launching the app will land you on a compact yet somewhat crowded UI. Most functions are labeled or have a description, yet there are a handful of buttons that lack both. This particular layout lets you use clipboard input, URL decoding, and a way to organize link names. One can also set up triggers, add timestamps, or lock files. In case the program gives you the feeling that something is missing, that's due to how the app was built. The settings area where additional changes can be done has its own launcher, called Settings. From this menu, one can manage created link lists, index them and view their contents. Conclusion LinkSaver is an interesting application that promises to deliver link lists, or as the developer calls it - an alternative to browser's bookmarks. However, using this application is not as fun and games as others. You'll have to be fairly skilled in matters of HTML and computing, in general, to successfully use this utility.

What's New In LinkSaver?

The link saver, or the link manager, helps you archive web links, i.e. the pages you visit, and create your own url list. It's a unique app, since its primary task is not to save bookmarks. You don't need to enter the web address of a page you'd like to bookmark. You're just to paste the URL. After that, you're free to choose what type of link list you want to generate. It can be a web page archive, a script archive, or just a default list of web pages. The output file is simply a.html file with the title of the list. The link saver creates the list of web pages by scanning a folder for all the HTML files on the Web and then converts the links to a standard HTML format. By doing so, you can save a standard link list on any PC or phone, as well as share it with other people. The script takes place with just a couple of clicks, which makes the process convenient and effective. You can even specify the minimum length of a link list you'd like to have. A separate application is required in order to install the link saver, however. You can get it here. Add the facebook keyword to your page and watch your clickthrough rate.
