RPitch allows users to train their relative pitch by listening to a series of intervals played on a keyboard. As the user plays notes that are an octave or a minor third apart on the keyboard, she hears a tone and a voice on the speaker. The voice tells her to play a note that is in-tune with the original tone. The application lets users practice aiming the mouth at the computer's speaker to dictate the audio track. Playing around with the settings will help users get comfortable with the process. Features Description: 1. Train relative pitch with vocals: The vocal sound can be used to prompt the user to play the notes while the computer plays the actual song. The user has the option of playing the sounds herself, or letting the computer play them. If the user plays the sounds herself, she can see the pitches on the keyboard and, depending on the range she has trained, can hear the audio track on the microphone. If the computer plays the audio track, she can hear the track and see the pitches. 2. Separate lines for upper and lower registers: RPitch allows for each note to be played, in the lower or upper register. The method for selecting between the lower or upper registers is accessible from the main window's Settings menu. 3. Practice Test: After completing the training section, the user can test her relative pitch with a simplified Practice Test which uses an automated approach to training. A bar line is used to mark the end of each trial. 4. Save Training Sessions: The user can save sessions of training, with the ability to select one or more song selections. Written in Java and using the javax.sound.midi API, this application is very easy to install and to use. It also provides a very simple interface that makes it ideal for young or elderly users who are just starting to hone their relative pitch. Comes with a few sound sounds and some customizable settings. DoodlePad is a minimalist but very functional audio note-taking application that allows users to record, store and play back audio notes.
